THE record player spun automatically . . . the last record has long since been played, and now the turntable whirred idly, unattended. Beverly didn't even hear it as she continued to stare out of her bedroom window looking intensely at the rain beating against the porch roof.

"Why . . . oh, why," she muttered to herself dramatically, "does this life have to be so incomparably, devastatingly dull!"

She wandered over to her record player at last and turned it off. She was just about to settle herself in the easy chair and read her history when the telephone's ring interrupted her thoughts.

"Absolutely infantile," she breathed. "Just when I finally decide to do something."

She heard her mother's voice from downstairs answering the phone, and then the shrill voice, "Beverly . . . it's for you."

Beverly sighed, then slowly walked to the table, put down her book and started down the stairs.

"Well, don't take all day, dear," her mother admonished. "Somebody's waiting to talk to you."

"Dribble," Beverly muttered.

Her mother's expression was a mixture of amusement and concern as she handed the telephone to her daughter.

"She thinks I'm a child," Bev thought annoyed. "They all do!" But she masked her feelings as she answered "Hello," into the receiver. After all, it just may be that fellow in her English class.

Then obvious disappointment filtered through her words. "Oh, Marcia . . . it's only you! No, I'm not going to Dotty's hen party, Oh, I don't know . . . I just don't think I would be able to stand that rot again. You know, the same old talk about boys and clothes and parties. Don't you think it's just too childish?"

Beverly's voice droned on, and her mother stood in the kitchen listening to the sophisticated words from her daughter.

"I suppose it's just a stage she's passing through," Mrs. Benton thought. "But I do wish she'd hurry up and pass through it. I suppose she doesn't realize how difficult she's being."

After her conversation, Bev felt mildly annoyed. "No companionship in this world," she told herself. "No real, true meeting of the souls!" She closed her bedroom door again and picked up her history book, and she studied until dinner was almost ready.

As Mr. Benton was eating his roast beef, he was telling his family about a particularly funny thing that happened in his office. Beverly didn't laugh. He tried suggesting a movie for the three of them that evening. Beverly was bored with what was playing. Finally, after the dinner dishes were washed and put away, her father tried to get Beverly interested in the night baseball game on television.

"Oh, daddy," Beverly cried at last . . . tried beyond the limit of her endurance, "How can you expect me to take any interest in something so unbearably uninteresting as baseball!" She flounced upstairs to her room, just barely catching the quizzical look exchanged by her mother and father.

The next day at school, the plans for a new scholarship club were being announced. It was not only for honor students, but for those who excelled in extra-curricular activities too. There would be prizes each month for each new activity that the students would compete for.

"I think it's really terribly juvenile," Beverly confided to Gloria later. "But everybody's doing it, and I suppose all the teachers would probably write home to mother or something if I didn't add my name to the eligible list."

But although Bev tried her best to hide her enthusiasm for the project, she was really interested in the prestige involved in belonging to such an exclusive activity. She could hardly hide her blushes of pride when the monitor came to her English class and beckoned her to come along to the office of the Dean of Girls.

"I suppose I should have something just devastating to say when she tells me I've won the prize for this month," Beverly thought. But she could see by the expression on Miss Graves' face that this joyous announcement wasn't going to be forthcoming.

"Sit down, Beverly," Miss Graves invited kindly. "I think you and I should have a little talk. I see that your name is among those wanting to belong to the new club."

"Yes, it is," Beverly told her, trying very hard to keep just

"Be serious now, my dear. What makes you think that you have anything to offer such a club. You haven't been interested in student activities for many months . . . and your teachers are telling me that your grades are falling recently. Is there anything wrong?"

"N-no . . . nothing at all," Beverly said defiantly. "And, I suppose I must have misunderstood you before," she decided to brave it through. "I most certainly did not put my name down for anything like this silly little club. And I haven't been interested in any of the student things because, well . . . because . . ." she faltered for just a moment. "Because I'm writing a book!" she declared.

Her brain was whirling with what she had just said, and she hastily justified herself in her mind. She thought, "I've always said I was going to write a book, and I really have thought about it a lot during the last few weeks."

"A book?" Miss Graves echoed. "Why, that's nice, Beverly. What's your book going to be about?"

"Well, I . . ." Beverly grasped at straws. "I really can't tell you now, Miss Graves. It's sort of an expose."

"Well, that's interesting," Miss Graves announced. "And don't forget, if anybody on the faculty, including myself, can help you out, please don't hesitate . . ."

Beverly hardly heard the last few words of the interview. She couldn't get out of the office quickly enough, and she was just barely able to struggle through her last class. On the way home from school, walking by herself, she tried to pull herself together.

"What do they mean interfering with my life like that?" she asked herself. "This world is absolutely ridiculous. They don't know what kind of a soul I have . . . all they see is what's on the surface. Silly, superficial attitudes." She ended her soliloquy with the threat, "I'll show them . . . I'll show them all by really writing that book!"

Mrs. Benton knew her daughter was home by the slamming front door. She walked slowly into the living room, catching Beverly before she went upstairs.

"Take your coat off and come here and sit down, Bev." her mother told her. "I think you and I need a little talk."

Beverly flushed. "That's the second time somebody's said that to me today," she thought. "Why can't they leave me alone?"

"Miss Graves just called here, and she was telling me about . . ."

"Oh, she did!" Beverly felt her temper rising. "Why can't she leave me alone? Do you know she called me into her office today and started talking to me like . . . well, like I was a criminal or something. All because of some silly mistake . . ."

"I know all about it," Mrs. Benton told her daughter. "I know something else too, honey. You've been walking to and from school all alone lately. Where are all your girl friends whom you used to walk with?"

Beverly maintained a stony silence.

"There haven't been any boys caling you for a long time either. They used to come around quite a bit. What happened to them?"

Beverly turned her face away.

"There have been no parties, no dates, nobody calling or coming to the house! Could it be because you've either frightened them away, or just plain bored them with all this pseudo-sophisticated manner you've been affecting?"

Beverly blurted out, "I don't need any of those childish people hanging around here taking up my time. I have more important things to do. Why, I'll bet you didn't even know that I was writing a . . . writing a . . ." but her tears muffled the rest of her sentence.

"There, there, honey," her mother put her arms around her. "I know how you feel. You think nobody loves you any more . . . but that's why we're really all so concerned about you. We do love you . . . very much."

Beverly turned her tear-stained face up to her mother's.

"It may have seemed like prying and being nosy to you . . . but we all want you to have is fun. And the only way you can do it is to have an interest in things, and that includes not only your friends and schoolwork, but your father's little jokes and even his baseball games sometimes."

Through her sobs, Beverly asked, "But what can I do. Nobody likes me any more. I guess I have been kind of snooty and selfish, but now how can I make them know I want to change?"

"Miss Graves and I had a little talk . . . about your book," her mother smiled. "And we feel that if your student activities have suffered because of that," Mrs. Benton avoided her daughter's averted glances, "they could make an allowance in your case, and let you join the club anyway."

"Oh, mother," Bev cried, "Did she really say that?"

Her mother's smiling face gave the answer.

"Oh, super!" Beverly shouted. "And, mom . . . do you think I could call Gloria and invite her over for some cocoa and cookies. I want her to tell me all about the date she had last night with that new boy."
